“Tomorrow,” said Mama Bear as she helped the cubs get ready for bed, “you’ll be going to the doctor for a checkup.”

“Doctor?” said Brother Bear. “We’re not sick!”

“And what’s a checkup?” asked Sister Bear, a little worried.

“It’s just what it sounds like,” said Mama. “Dr. Grizzly will check to see if you are growing the way healthy cubs should.”

“Will it hurt?” asked Sister, pulling the covers up close.

“Now, now,” said Papa Bear as he kissed her good night. “You just settle down. There’s absolutely nothing to worry about.”

But Sister wasn't so sure.

The next morning, after a good breakfast, the family got into their red roadster and were on the way.

“Do you ever get checkups, Mama?” Sister asked as they drove along the dusty dirt road.

“Yes, I do,” answered Mama.

"I don't need checkups anymore," bragged Papa. "Because I ... I ..."

never get sick.”

“That was quite a sneeze,” said Mama.

“It’s this dusty road,” said Papa, turning onto the main highway into Beartown.

They pulled to a stop in front of the doctor's office.

"Come, cubs!" said Mama. "We don't want to be late for our appointment."

But Brother held back. He remembered something.

“Are we going to get shots?” he asked.

“That’s up to ... to ... to ...

... the doctor,” said Papa, sneezing an even bigger sneeze than before.

“Bless you!” said Mama.

“I never get sick.”

The doctor's waiting room was a busy, cheerful place with pictures on the walls, books to look at and puzzles to do.

Brother started a puzzle. Sister took a book, but didn't really look at it. Other bears were coming in and she looked around the room at them. There were cubs of all ages with their parents.

Some of the smallest cubs looked a little worried. Sister smiled at them so they wouldn't be afraid.

There was a big cub with a cast on his leg. It had names and funny drawings all over it.

He let Brother write his name on it for luck, and Sister drew a picture.

There was even a little baby cub only a few weeks old.
